

GUIDANCE NOTE

Mutual Recognition of Interstate Induction Cards

This information provides a guide to mutual recognition of interstate induction for construction work cards.

Mutual recognition arrangements enhance the capacity of construction workers to move across state/territory boundaries without the requirement to undertake construction induction training in each jurisdiction.

The construction induction card examples in this document are recognised as evidence of meeting requirements for general induction training for construction work under the Tasmanian Code of Practice for Induction for Construction Work.

All cards that have been issued after successful completion of the national training unit CPCCOHS1001A will be recognised in Tasmania.

A person holding a current and valid general construction induction card from another jurisdiction will not need to undertake general induction training for construction work in Tasmania and will not need to obtain a Tasmanian white card. Workplace Standards Tasmania will deem these cards as equivalent to the Tasmanian construction induction scheme and accept them as proof of general induction in Tasmania as per the Tasmanian Code.

The recognition of white, blue, red and construction induction cards only applies to general induction training (classroom based) for construction work. Principal contractors and employers must ensure that task induction and site-specific induction training is undertaken as required by the Code.
